It can take longer in the long run, but you have a better chance of your email being seen as planned. But that does not mean that your contacts are using the same platforms. In addition, I certify that I have learned from my start-up or last review for at least the necessary minimum hours per week. The benefit of inline CSS use is that most email providers will support this style, which means you will probably get the best results without running in any formatting problem. So as a result, they can just try to optimize your email to work for most of your public. Instead, there are the capabilities of the email provider, all that may differ depending on the version of the email provider that you are using. But you can take a step forward and just send all your emails using basic html or plain text. Although a large time protector, especially on large and complex sites, CSS can be much less trustworthy with emails. How to be successful with CSS in HTML e-mail only because there may be problems with CSS in HTML emails, it does not mean that you should abandon the efforts to use it. Although it may seem great in the Gmail application of your friend, you could open the email in Outlook in your work area and appeared stripped without pictures, like this: Source: css-tricks.com Another common problem with e-mail CSS refers -if the format. Use inline CSS. Do not use CSS. See which platforms your Public is using. 3. Here is HTML: - Review date: Review ID: {! Learning {!
